Medical Treatment After a Midland Car Accident and Your Claim See a doctor soon, and keep going until your provider says you're done. That one habit may do more for an injury claim than almost anything else you do in the first month after a crash. Midland Memorial Hospital is the area's main hospital and trauma care center, so if an ambulance takes you from a wreck on Loop 250 or Big Spring Street, that's likely where you'll end up. If you drove yourself home, an urgent care visit or a trip to your regular doctor still counts. What matters is that someone with medical training examines you and writes down what they find. Why does this matter so much? Insurance adjusters look for reasons to pay less, and one of their favorite arguments is the treatment gap. Say you felt sore after a fender bender near Midland Park Mall, skipped the doctor, and finally went in three weeks later when your neck wouldn't turn. The adjuster may claim something else caused the pain during those three weeks. It isn't fair, but it's common. The same problem shows up if you start physical therapy and then stop for a month because work got busy. A gap in your records can turn Midland Car Accident Lawyer into a gap in what the insurer offers. Texas law lets injured people recover medical bills, future care, lost wages, pain and suffering and mental anguish, but each of those depends car accident lawyer Midland on proof, and your medical records carry most of that weight.
