PIP and PDL: what Florida's minimum auto insurance actually pays

Florida law requires drivers to carry a minimum amount of auto insurance, but the coverage is different from what many people expect. The state mandates Personal Injury Protection (PIP) and Property Damage Liability (PDL), not the bodily injury liability that is common elsewhere. Understanding what these two coverages pay for - and what they leave out - matters for anyone who gets behind the wheel in Naples or anywhere in Florida.

PIP and PDL were designed to keep claims small and fast after a crash, but the limits are low. A serious accident can exhaust both coverages quickly, leaving the at-fault driver personally responsible for the rest. This article explains how each part works, what it covers, and what it means for your own financial risk.

Personal Injury Protection (PIP) - what it covers

PIP is often called "no-fault" coverage because it pays your medical bills and some lost wages regardless of who caused the accident. Florida requires every driver to carry at least $10,000 in PIP. This coverage applies to you, your household relatives who live with you, and any passengers in your vehicle at the time of the crash. It also covers you if you are hit as a pedestrian or bicyclist.

PIP pays 80 percent of necessary medical expenses up to the policy limit. The remaining 20 percent is your responsibility unless you have additional health insurance or a MedPay policy to fill the gap. The coverage also pays 60 percent of lost wages, again up to the limit. A $200 deductible usually applies to PIP before the insurance starts paying, though you can choose a higher deductible to lower your premium.

There are important limits on what PIP covers. It will not pay for care that is not deemed emergency medical treatment within 14 days of the accident. If you delay seeing a doctor, you lose PIP benefits entirely. The coverage also excludes alternative therapies and certain diagnostic tests unless they are ordered by a licensed physician. Many drivers assume PIP covers all their medical bills after a crash, but the $10,000 limit can be used up by a single emergency room visit and follow-up care. A serious injury requiring surgery or ongoing treatment will far exceed that amount.

Property Damage Liability (PDL) - what it covers

PDL pays for damage you cause to someone else's property with your vehicle. Florida requires a minimum of $10,000 in PDL. This coverage applies when you hit another car, a fence, a building, a mailbox, or any other structure. It does not cover damage to your own vehicle. If you cause an accident and the other driver's car is a total loss, your $10,000 limit may not be enough to cover the full value of their vehicle. The same applies if you damage public property like a traffic signal or guardrail - the repair costs can quickly exceed $10,000.

PDL also covers legal fees if the other party sues you for property damage. The insurance company will defend you up to the policy limit, but any judgment beyond that amount is your personal responsibility. The $10,000 minimum was set decades ago and has not kept pace with the cost of vehicles and repairs. A modern car can easily cost $30,000 or more, and a multi-vehicle accident can cause damage far exceeding one policy limit.

What Florida's minimum insurance does not cover

The most surprising gap for many drivers is the lack of bodily injury liability coverage. Florida does not require you to carry coverage for injuries you cause to other people. If you are at fault in an accident, your PIP pays for your own injuries and those of your passengers, but it does not pay a cent toward the other driver's medical bills. Without bodily injury liability, the other driver can sue you personally for their medical costs, lost wages, and pain and suffering. A lawsuit can wipe out savings, garnish wages, or force the sale of assets.

Another gap is the lack of coverage for damage to your own vehicle. PDL pays for damage you cause to others, but it does not cover repairs to your car. If you want protection for your own vehicle, you need collision coverage, which is optional under Florida law. Comprehensive coverage, which covers theft, vandalism, and weather damage, is also optional. Many drivers who finance a car are required by the lender to carry both collision and comprehensive, but those coverages are not part of the state minimum.

Uninsured and underinsured motorist coverage is also optional in Florida. This coverage pays for your injuries if you are hit by a driver who has no insurance or not enough insurance. Given that a significant number of Florida drivers are uninsured, this optional coverage can be a critical safety net. How the limits stack up in a real crash

Imagine you cause a minor accident. The other driver's car needs $8,000 in repairs. Your PDL pays that, and your PIP pays 80 percent of your own $5,000 medical bill, or $4,000. You owe the remaining $1,000 out of pocket. In that scenario, the minimum coverage works reasonably well.

Now imagine a more serious crash. You rear-end a newer SUV at an intersection. The SUV sustains $25,000 in damage. Your PDL pays $10,000. You owe the other driver $15,000 personally. Your own injuries require surgery and physical therapy costing $40,000. Your PIP pays $10,000. Your health insurance may cover some of the rest, but you still face significant out-of-pocket costs and potential wage loss. The other driver's lawyer may also pursue you for their medical bills since you have no bodily injury liability coverage.

This is why many insurance professionals recommend carrying more than the state minimum. Adding bodily injury liability coverage of $100,000 per person and $300,000 per accident provides protection that the minimum does not. The cost difference between a minimum policy and one with higher limits is often modest, especially when compared to the financial risk of being underinsured.

What Naples drivers should consider

Naples has a mix of local traffic and seasonal visitors. Snowbirds and tourists may be unfamiliar with the roads, and accidents involving out-of-state drivers can introduce complications. If you are hit by a driver from a state with different insurance requirements, your own coverage may need to fill the gap. The Auto Insurance Naples website provides information on how Florida's minimum coverage compares with policies from other states and what options are available for drivers who want more protection.

Another factor is the value of your own vehicle. If you drive an older car that is paid off, you may decide that collision coverage is not worth the premium. But if you have a newer car or a loan, collision and comprehensive are usually worth carrying. The same logic applies to your own health insurance. If you have good health insurance with a low deductible, the PIP gap may be less concerning. If you have a high-deductible plan or no health insurance, the $10,000 PIP limit becomes a real vulnerability.

Drivers who carry only the state minimum should also be aware that their insurance rates may go up after a claim even if they were not at fault. Florida law allows insurers to raise rates for any claim where the driver is more than 50 percent at fault, but some insurers raise rates for any claim regardless of fault. Shopping around for a policy that offers accident forgiveness or rate protection can help avoid surprises.

Finally, it is worth understanding that the state minimum is exactly that - a minimum. It was designed to keep the cost of insurance low enough that everyone can afford a policy, not to provide full protection. The trade-off is that drivers who carry only the minimum accept a higher level of personal financial risk. For many people, paying a little more for higher limits and additional coverages is a smart way to protect their savings and future earnings.

If you are reviewing your current policy or shopping for a new one, take the time to understand what PIP and PDL actually cover and where the gaps are. A conversation with a local agent or a visit to a comparison site can help you decide whether the minimum is right for your situation or whether you need more protection. Knowing what your policy pays - and what it does not - is the first step toward making a confident choice about your auto insurance.
