

To pay for flowers and chocolates delivered overseas, choose a florist that serves the recipient's address, add both items to your order, and pay online using an accepted method. Before you confirm, check the currency, total cost, delivery details, and any restrictions on the chocolates.

Choose a delivery service

Start with the recipient's full address and search for a florist that delivers to that area. A florist based near the recipient may be able to prepare the flowers and include chocolates in the same delivery. Some services let you add chocolates during checkout, while others offer a gift set that already includes them.

Check the product description carefully. The flowers and chocolates shown in a photo may not be exactly what arrives, especially if the florist needs to make a substitution. Look for information about the size of the chocolate box and any stated ingredients if those details matter to the recipient.

Confirm that the service accepts orders from your country. Being able to view a website does not always mean you can use a billing address or payment method from abroad.

Check the payment and total

At checkout, look for accepted payment methods. A credit or debit card may be an option, and some florists also accept digital wallets. Enter your own billing address where requested and the recipient's address in the delivery fields.

Before paying, review these details:

- The currency used for the final charge.

- The cost of the flowers, chocolates, and delivery.
- Any taxes or other charges shown at checkout.
- Possible foreign transaction or currency conversion fees from your card issuer.
- The delivery date and the florist's policy on substitutions and refunds.

Your card issuer may convert the charge into your usual currency. If the checkout offers a choice of currencies, compare the amounts and any conversion terms before selecting one. The amount on your card statement can differ from an estimate shown earlier in the order.

Confirm delivery details

Give the florist a phone number for the recipient if the checkout requests one and you have permission to share it. A local number can help the driver resolve an address issue or arrange a handover. Include a building name or entry instructions if needed.

Consider how the chocolates will be handled if nobody is home. Warm weather can affect them, and delivery services may have different rules about leaving gifts unattended. Ask the florist if the checkout does not explain what happens after a missed delivery.

Save the order confirmation and check that it lists both the flowers and chocolates. If something is wrong, contact the florist promptly with the order details.

Common questions

Can I pay in my own currency?

Some services offer that choice, but others charge in the recipient's local currency. Check the final payment screen and your card issuer's fees.

Can I send chocolates separately from the flowers?

Yes, but separate orders may arrive at different times and have separate delivery charges. A combined order can make the handover easier to coordinate.

You may also like corporate flower etiquette