

Yes, you can give orchids to celebrate a baby's arrival. A flowering orchid can be a thoughtful gift for the parents, particularly if they enjoy plants and have a suitable place for one.

Why an orchid can feel right

A new baby often brings gifts meant for immediate use. An orchid offers something different: a living plant for the family to enjoy as their days begin to settle into a new rhythm.

The flowers can last for weeks, so the gift need not be enjoyed all at once. A small plant can sit on a table or shelf without taking up much room, though it will still need suitable light.

Consider the parents rather than relying on a supposed meaning for the flower. An orchid in a color they like, accompanied by a few warm words, can feel more personal than a plant chosen for symbolism alone.

Choosing an orchid

A moth orchid, also called a Phalaenopsis, is a practical choice. It is widely available as a houseplant and has arching stems of flowers. Look for healthy green leaves and a sturdy pot, with some flowers open and a few buds still closed.

Keep the size manageable. A large arrangement may be impressive, but it can be awkward in a crowded home or hospital room. One plant in a simple pot is easier to carry and place.

If you are sending it to a hospital, check its rules first. Some rooms or units may restrict plants, and the family may have little space to take gifts home. Sending the orchid after they return home can be simpler.

Make the gift easy to receive

New parents may not have much time for plant care. Include the care instructions that come with the orchid, or choose another gift if you know a plant would feel like one more task.

Moth orchids generally prefer bright, indirect light. Their potting mix should not stay waterlogged, and a pot with drainage helps excess water escape. Care can vary with the plant's growing conditions, so the instructions supplied with it are useful.

Place the plant and its pot out of a baby's reach as the child grows. It is also worth asking about pets before choosing a plant for a household with animals.

A note can be brief: welcome the baby, congratulate the parents, and let them know you are thinking of them. There is no need to make the orchid stand for more than that.

Questions you may have

Is an orchid a gift for the baby or the parents?

It is best thought of as a gift for the parents or household. The baby may receive plenty of clothes and practical items from others.

Does the orchid need to be pink or blue?

No. White, yellow, purple, or any color the parents enjoy can be a lovely choice.

What if the parents do not like plants?

Choose something they will appreciate more. A personal note can make a simple alternative feel just as thoughtful.

Read next: decorating a room with bouquets