Rows of Victorian and Edwardian terraces give Roath much of its character, and many of those homes still sit beneath slate roofs with chimney stacks rising above the street. Those roofs have stood up to decades of Welsh weather, from driving rain to freeze-thaw cycles, and they need knowledgeable care to keep going. Redland Roofing Cardiff is an independent, family-run business from South Wales with over 30 years of experience serving Cardiff and South East Wales. For Roath homeowners looking for roofers Cardiff people recommend, the team brings practical experience of exactly this type of property. Victorian terrace roofs have their own particular weak spots. Slipped or broken slates let water in, chimney brickwork and pointing break down over time, and flashing where the stack meets the roof can crack and fail. Lead work, ridge tiles and valleys between neighbouring roofs all play a part in keeping a terrace dry. Many Roath terraces also have flat-roofed rear extensions or dormers, which bring their own maintenance needs. The team repairs slate and tiled roofs, carries out chimney repairs including repointing and flashing, renews lead joints and replaces flat roofs, with EPDM rubber a speciality. Good slate can outlast the building it sits on, so a full replacement is not always the answer. The team gives honest advice and will not recommend a replacement if a repair will do. Every visit begins with a free assessment, and customers often mention John, who explains the problem clearly and shows photos of what is https://blogfreely.net/thartaezmt/plasnewydd-and-city-road-roofers-cardiff-working-on-tight-terraced-streets happening on the roof. Parts of Roath fall within a conservation area, and the team has experience working in these streets, where changing materials may need Cardiff Council consent. The same knowledge applies in nearby Plasnewydd, Penylan and Cathays.
