The best part of many weddings happens after the formal moments are over. The toasts are done, the cake has been cut, and guests drift outside to talk under the stars. At Bailey Wick Farm Wedding & Event Venue in Fincastle, reviewers mention a fire pit among the features they enjoyed, and it gives couples a natural gathering place for the later hours of the night.

A fire pit fits Southwest Virginia evenings perfectly. Even in summer, the air in Botetourt County cools after sunset, and in spring and Have a peek here fall a warm fire is a welcome sight. Guests who need a break from the dance floor can settle in, share stories and enjoy the quiet of the countryside while the music carries from the barn.

Fire pit moments also make great photos. Warm light on faces, sparklers or lanterns in the background and the dark outline of the mountains behind create images that feel very different from the bright reception shots inside. Ask your photographer to stay for at least a few minutes of this part of the evening if your package allows it.

Ideas for the Fire Pit Hour

A s'mores station is the classic choice, and it delights guests of every age. You could also set out blankets, a hot cider or cocoa bar for cooler months, or a late-night snack table with something simple like biscuits or sliders. Some couples plan an acoustic song or two by the fire to wind the evening down gently before the send-off.

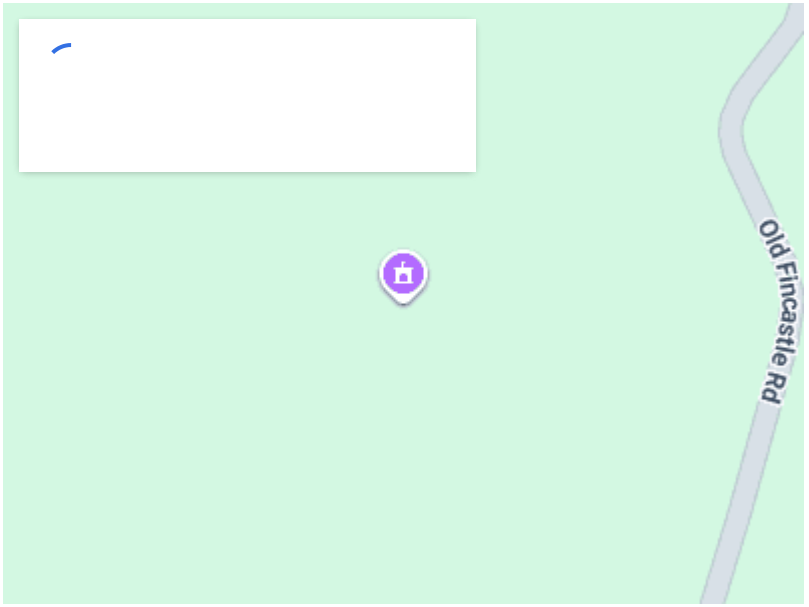

Inside, the barn keeps the party going with heating and air conditioning, a gas log fireplace and plenty of room for dancing. Between the fire pit, the barn and the wide covered porch with its rocking chairs, guests can move freely and find the setting that suits their mood, which helps keep everyone at the celebration longer.

Safety and Comfort Around the Fire

Ask the family how the fire pit is usually managed during events and who will tend it, so you can relax and enjoy the evening. Provide a few extra chairs or benches nearby, and keep a basket of blankets handy for guests who get chilly. If children are attending, assign an adult to keep an eye on the s'mores station so the fun stays safe for everyone while the grown-ups catch up by the fire.
