

For an O'Hare return beginning in Grafton, describe the luggage you will actually take from Wisconsin to the Chicago airport. A stay can change bag count, shape, or handling requirements even when the passengers remain the same. Compare the finished return packing with the earlier request and confirm any material difference before pickup.

The inbound inventory is a useful reference, but it records another journey. You may have received gifts, collected work items, or replaced a case during the visit. These changes can disappear when a traveller says "the same bags as before." Look at the physical load rather than relying on the memory of how the trip started.

Rebuild the luggage description

Count large cases, cabin bags, personal items, and anything carried separately. If a purchase fits inside a suitcase, describe the resulting suitcase rather than counting the purchase as another object. If it travels in a separate box or tote, include it. The request should concern what the chauffeur will actually encounter at the starting address.

Identify rigid, long, or unusually shaped items. Measure the outer form when needed and state any requirement about orientation or contact with other bags. Ask whether the proposed arrangement can accommodate it. Do not assume protective packaging, specialist handling, or a storage feature from the limousine service description.

Include a changed passenger list beside the load. A relative joining the departure may add both a person and their own luggage. Gather their final information before sending the combined request. A bag reduction for one traveller does not automatically cancel a larger object brought by another; the real mix still needs review.

Keep the revised load attached to the return

State that the inventory applies to the Grafton-to-O'Hare leg. If the same conversation contains arrival details, an unlabelled update can be applied to the wrong direction. Give the complete current description and ask whether the proposed arrangement remains suitable. Sending new information does not itself confirm acceptance.

Verify the actual Wisconsin pickup address. The visit may end at a different place from the initial arrival, and the luggage needs to be there with the traveller. If bags must be collected elsewhere, discuss that additional movement explicitly. Do not leave a chauffeur to infer a collection from the changed inventory.

Check the current O'Hare departure itinerary and any relevant airline baggage guidance. A flight packing decision may alter the ground load, but airline acceptance does not establish fit in the proposed transport arrangement. After packing is final, keep the provider's actual answer with the return record.

Give the travelling contact a concise copy that joins address, flight, party, and luggage. Report any further material change through the agreed channel. The return remains clearer when the Wisconsin visit ends with a current load description and an understood agreement, instead of an assumption that the original Chicago airport arrival covered everything brought home.
